Envoy From Bonn To Israel Expects 'A Future For Both'

Dr. Rolf Pauls, the West German Ambassador to Israel, arrived at Lydda Airport, in Israel to pave the way for "a better and brighter future" for the relations of Jews and Germans. He flew into a heavily guarded airport that was virtually free of demonstrators. A small crowd, attracted largely by police barriers, waited silently outside, says the New York Times. The only indication of protest was given by a woman who waved a sign reading, "We want a German-free Israel."

Dr. Pauls, a former German Army officer who lost an arm in World War II spoke briefly at the airport on the delicate relations between Israel and West Germany.

"I think Germans and Jews don't have only to face the terrible past, which we should not forget for one moment," he said. "I think Jews and Germans are going to have a future, too — and again, a future for both of us. It is up to us, to all of us, to use our days, to employ the effort of our generation to prepare, to pave the way into a better and brighter future, a future of freedom, justice, and peace in common."

Dr. Pauls said that it was in this spirit that he would devote the efforts of the West German Embassy. "All my love and assistance will belong to all efforts to bring young Germans and Israel to understand each other to cooperate with each other."

He avoided answering questions that dealt with the controversy that flared up over his appointment. Dr. Pauls, a career diplomat, said he thought it would be proper to pay his respects to the Israeli Government before discussing these points.

Dr. Pauls was met at the airport by Israel's Chief of Protocol, Yehuda Gaulan, who greeted him with the words, "welcome to Israel" in English. Mr. Gaulan said he did not speak German and Dr. Pauls did not speak Hebrew, "so we'll talk in English." Mr. Gaulan was formerly the Consul-General of Israel in Montreal; and the Canadian Jewish Review remembers him for his simplicity, his charm, and his kindness.

Israeli security policemen, including one of Prime Minister Levi Eshkol's personal bodyguards, joined uniformed policemen and German security policemen in checking the glass-walled side lounge used for the occasion.

The expected demonstrations did not take place, however. Dr. Pauls spent less than ten minutes in the lounge and then left for Tel Aviv, eleven miles from Lydda, where the embassy staff is making its headquarters in a hotel, says the New York Times. Dr. Pauls is expected to present his credentials to President Zalman Shazar at a ceremony that will be as closely guarded as arrival.

The problem of the Soviet Jew remains unchanged despite "token concessions in recent months," the American Jewish Conference on Soviet Jewry told the New York Times, in New York. The organization, with offices at 838 Fifth Avenue, also expressed "concern and alarm" that the Soviet Union might be reviving its campaign of economic trials against Jews.

The concern was caused, they said, by the recent and rare publication in Pravda, the Soviet Communist party newspaper, of an appeal to the public to help in tracking down three men wanted in a black-market swindle. Two of the three men whose photographs were printed had Jewish names and so did another suspect.

"There can be no doubt about the fright caused to Moscow's Jews by these developments," said the Conference, representing Jewish religious, civic, and Zionist groups.

The Chief Rabbi of Moscow, Yehudi-Leib Levin, said in Moscow that Jewish delegations and private tourists from the United States would be welcome in the Soviet Union "if they come in a spirit of peace and unity."

"If delegations should come for the purpose of writing slanders about our country, let them stay at home," Rabbi Levin said in an interview, with the New York Times.

The encouragement of personal ties between American and Soviet Jews was one of the main purposes of the visit of an official delegation from the Rabbinical Council of America, headed by its president, Rabbi Israel Miller, of New York.

For years, a feeling of isolation has grown among Soviet Jews as bureaucratic harassment was making difficult the practice of religion and the maintenance of their cultural identity.

Foreign criticism, largely from the United States, has apparently made the Soviet Government sensitive about its unfavorable image on a matter that seems more dramatic overseas than it does to the public in Moscow. In Soviet public life, Communist atheism overshadows any religion.

The chief Rabbi and his staff have been confronted with a dilemma by the criticism from overseas. Their natural interest is in leading the congregations in the practice of their religion. At the same time, Rabbi Levin is beholden to the Soviet authorities for the operation of the synagogue and for whatever religious facilities he is able to obtain.

A special Government agency, the Council for the Affairs of Religious Cults, which reports directly to the Council of Ministers, oversees the activities of religions except the Russian Orthodox Church, which is under a separate government agency.

The governing board of the Central Synagogue, including Mr. Mikhailovich, was appointed by Government authorities, according to reports in Moscow. The 70-year-old, full-bearded Rabbi, said he has been busy since 1962 making a precise Russian translation of the Hebrew prayer book in order to obtain authorization from officials for the publication of a new edition.

The last time a prayer book was published in the Soviet Union was in 1956, and in such a small edition that few copies have been seen. Most worshipers carry ragged prayer-books more than fifty years old.

Rabbi Levin said authority to publish the new edition in three volumes was received, coinciding with the visit of the American rabbinical delegation. The Chief Rabbi hopes to have the Hebrew work in ten thousand copies, available by Yom Kippur this fall.

To whatever extent the foreign criticism of Soviet policy is responsible for the present more relaxed official attitude, Rabbi Levin made no apologies for the status accorded to the Jewish religion.

"We want people to come from abroad to see the factual situation and then report it," he said in the presence of the synagogue officers.

The American Rabbinical delegation, representing the American Orthodox Council, made an official request to the Soviet Government that at least minimum facilities for kosher food be established for Jewish tourists from abroad.

Nothing that kosher kitchens were available for tourists in most major cities of Europe, Rabbi Miller proposed that the Russians establish one there. His request was forwarded to Intourist, the Soviet travel service, which is conducting a campaign to attract more tourists.

The American rabbis were deeply impressed by the emotional welcome they received when they addressed the congregation at the Central Synagogue.

"Jews here are clearly longing for contact with their brethren in America," Rabbi Miller said before leaving Moscow. "With the Soviet Government encouraging tourism, we are hoping that the number of private Jewish visitors from the United States will increase."

Bloustein, Aged 40, N.Y.U. La... ...fessor Who Rose From Poverty On Scholarships, Is New President Of Bennington, One Of Most Expensive And Anti-Traditional Women's Colleges In U.S.

Dr. Edward J. Bloustein, a forty-year-old professor of law at New York University, has been named president of Bennington College, widely known as one of the most expensive and least Orthodox women's colleges in the U.S. Dr. Bloustein is a former political analyst for the Department of State, specializing in Marxist theory, says the New York Times. He is an advocate of the European tradition of "scholars in public life."

The college trustees met at the picturesque Vermont campus, set in a broad valley between the Taconic and Green Mountain ranges, for commencement exercises. In July they announced his selection.

Bennington has always been anti-traditional. Dr. Bloustein has had no experience as an educational administrator. In picking a young man with less than one year of full professorship, and that in law, the liberal arts college has again shown its disdain for custom.

Dr. William C. Fels, who went to Bennington as president in 1957 with a background in educational finance, died of cancer last November at forty-eight years of age.

Bennington College opened its doors in 1932, with John Dewey's experimentalism near the heart of its inspiration. Soon it got a reputation as a mildly wild refuge for young women of privilege encumbered with the gravest pretensions to art, intellect, and unapologetic...

The college still has no required courses. Students get no marks. They accumulate no graduation credits. One observer wrote that the names of most courses at Bennington sound like titles for articles in The Hudson Review.

At Bennington, Dr. Bloustein will not be called "doctor." He will be called "mister." There are no professorial ranks at the college, and everyone there, from freshmen to president, is known simply as Mr. or Mrs. or Miss.

The college is 200 miles from New York City in the south-western corner of Vermont. Smooth grassy knolls roll gently over its 380-acre countryside campus. There are 360 students — a population of less than one student to an acre. The tuition, including room and board, is $3,450 a year.

The whole setting has the chaste beauty of a small Vermont village. There are white Colonial frame houses, red cattle barns, and an old carriage house, says the New York Times. The administration building once a barn, is called simply, "The Barn."

When the late Frank Lloyd Wright, the architect, visited the campus, perhaps expecting it to be as free-wheeling architecturally as it was spiritually, he was taken aback by its picture-calendar tranquility. "The place is a living lie," he said with almost bitter scorn.

Dr. Bloustein, the son of an immigrant Polish egg merchant, was born in the Bronx and reared there in poverty. He achieved dazzling success in university studies, winning scholarships that paid his way through three colleges.

He earned four academic degrees — at Cornell, New York University, and Wadham College, Oxford — and won major distinctions along the way.

In an interview, Dr. Bloustein said:

"What I take to be my role is to demonstrate that a small liberal arts college, devoted to a vital role to play in a mass society can be dedicated to technology and scientism."

Dr. Bloustein graduated from N.Y.U. in 1948 — with a Phi Beta Kappa key — as a philosophy and psychology major. He earned the bachelor of philosophy degree as a Fulbright Scholar at Oxford. He taught philosophy at Brooklyn College for a year and later at Cornell in 1954-55.

He took his Ph.D. degree in philosophy at Cornell in 1954 and went on to the law school, becoming editor in chief of the Cornell Law Quarterly and winner of the first Frazer Prize for excellence in scholarship.

In 1951-52 he worked as a political analyst in the Office of Intelligence at the U.S. State Department. Dr. Bloustein's study of the history, ideology, and aims of the East German Communist Party, titled "Political Dynamics of East Germany," was published under security classification.

He joined the faculty of N.Y.U. Law School in 1961 as an assistant professor. He will be inaugurated at Bennington in September.

Most teachers there are men, and each student is assigned a faculty counselor. She spends an hour a week with him, pouring out her enthusiasms, perplexities, and tensions, sometimes with tears.

From January to early March each year the girls leave the campus, often then lying under a glistening blanket of ice and snow. They take jobs allied to their academic pursuits, says the New York Times. The story is told of an earnest sociology major who once asked her counselor: "What petty crime could I commit in order to spend ten weeks in jail?"

Many Bennington faculty members are active writers, artists, composers, and dancers. Howard Nemerov, Stanley Edgar Hyman, and Bernard Malamud are among those now in residence. The girls are encouraged to associate with such august figures on campus.

"Me go to Erich Fromm with my little problem?" a girl once said, hesitating to take her trifling woes to the eminent psychoanalyst when he was a visiting professor there.

Bennington accepts a small number of male students. It recently graduated 64 women and three men. "You can't run a drama or ballet program with female students only," a faculty member explained.

Among the many scholarships that carried Edward J. Bloustein from a boyhood of poverty through three colleges — and now to the presidency of Bennington College in Vermont — there is one he calls the "Ruth Ellen Scholarship." To Dr. Bloustein that scholarship is distinctive. It stands apart. Ruth Ellen is his wife.

The year was 1952, and he was a graduate student at Cornell. He had married Ruth Ellen Steinman of Brooklyn in 1950. Two years earlier she had graduated from medical school, and now she has completed four years of work in hospitals.

Life was a little complicated. The young father-to-be was studying on $1,800 a year. And his wife was pregnant. So Ruth Ellen entered right into her pediatric practice, taking exactly ten days out to give birth to their daughter, Elise.

"Ed was doing his work for his doctorate in philosophy and I was the one that was earning the mundane type of stuff — like money," she recalled, says the New York Times. "He used to hold our first-born on his lap and answer the phone when I was out on house calls. Actually, his work was much more straining and tormenting than mine. He was giving birth to a thesis."

For Dr. Bloustein, a professor of law at New York University, the move from Washington Square to the southwestern corner of Vermont will put him much nearer the New England mountain trails on which he likes to take long hikes with his wife. But the move to Vermont will carry Mrs. Bloustein — Dr. Ruth Ellen Steinman — far from her well-established pediatric practice.

Elise is twelve years old now, and their younger daughter, Lori, is ten. The family lives in a white frame house that is set on a hill, on a quiet street in Ardsley, a Westchester community on the Hudson River.

In back of the house there is a cement-block structure, a former artist's studio with a huge north-light exposure. Dr. Bloustein made it into a private study with a law library of nearly 1,200 volumes.

Some years ago, when Dr. Bloustein studied mortgages in law school, he found he could not handle the subject with the cool academic interest of the young men about him. His mind kept running back to the bleak boyhood day when the bank foreclosed his father's mortgage, forcing the family — in which he was the youngest of seven children — to move out of the decent house they had on Manning Street in Castle Hill, the Bronx.

His father, Samuel Bloustein, had come to New York City from Lublin, Poland, in 1912 as a boy of fourteen. He got a job washing glassware at a Fifth Avenue hotel, but was discharged when he insisted on having the Jewish High Holy Days off.

Edward J. Bloustein (he has no middle name) was born on January 20, 1925. The Depression hit, his father's wholesale egg business went bankrupt, and the mortgage was foreclosed. Samuel opened a retail egg store on Zerech Avenue, in the Bronx, says the New York Times, and his son recalled standing behind the counter as a boy "waiting for the customers that never came."

"I've been on scholarship ever since I was about nine," Dr. Bloustein said with joined hyperbole. "There was just a pervasive sense in the household that there was only one avenue up, and it was education.

"Six out of seven of us received college educations without my father ever having to pay a penny." Another brother, Francis Bloustein, now a member of the City Planning Commission, became law secretary to Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia.

At the James Monroe High School in the Bronx, what he calls his interior dialogue began.

"I had a sense then that I wanted to be a rounded person, and I had an idea that what the United States needed was the tradition of scholars in public life, not merely as theoreticians but as middle men of ideas. Fortunately I met young women who allowed me to talk that kind of cant — and they fell in love with me, too," Dr. Bloustein recalled.

Dr. Bloustein smokes a pipe. He has hazel eyes and thick, faintly white-streaked brown hair. He stands five feet, eight and a half inches tall. He reads massively in novels, history, biography, political theory, and the law. He listens to music, and plays tennis poorly. He can not repair anything.

The family has a pleasant lake-side house on Lake Buel at Hartsville, near Great Barrington, Mass., says the New York Times. Dr. Bloustein has a "snipe," a 16-foot sailboat, in which he skims over the lake in the summers.

In an interview with the New York Herald Tribune, the new president revealed that he has been appointed counsel by the New York State Court of Appeals to represent Dominick J. Carbonaro, thirty, a short-order cook in a Chinese restaurant, convicted of fatally shooting a man in a fruitless jewelry-shop holdup in Manhasset, L.I.

Carbonaro joined death row October 7, 1963. But since Gov. Rockefeller signed the law eliminating the death penalty for most murders on June 1, Carbonaro no

JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL ALLOCATES $37 MILLION FOR USE NOW IN ISRAEL

The Jewish Agency for Israel, Inc., chief beneficiary of the United Jewish Appeal campaign, allocated $37 million to carry out urgent humanitarian programs among Israel's large immigrant population. The action was taken by the Agency's board of directors, headed by Dewey D. Stone, after a detailed analysis of pressing refugee problems was outlined by Louis Pincus, treasurer of the Jewish Agency, in Jerusalem, and also a member of the board of directors of JAFI, Inc.

The Jerusalem Agency carries out the programs of resettlement, absorption, rehabilitation among Israel's newcomers, on behalf of the American body. The allocations were recommended by Isador Lubin, the Agency's Consultant for Programs in Israel, and approved by the Board.

Mr. Pincus called attention to the entry of a quarter of a million immigrants into Israel in the last five years, emphasizing that there was an acute shortage of funds to cope with the pressing economic, medical, social, and educational needs of "multiplied heterogeneous thousands of Jewish men, women and children." He warned that Israel's new development towns are "seriously lagging behind economically; underprivileged educationally; isolated socially in varying degrees, posing "a grave threat to their residents being integrated into the nation's economic and social life."

Mr. Stone asserted that the emphasis in budgeting and expenditures, "is now beginning to change towards the direct relief of human misery and the alleviation of suffering to greater stress on the immediate cure of and welfare services to individuals."

A breakdown of the allocations includes such outlays as $13,030,000 for immigration; $10,087,000 for absorption; $2,250,000 for youth care and training; $3,758,000 for absorption in agricultural settlements; $5,600,000 for construction of immigrant housing; $1,255,000 towards the maintenance of institutions of higher learning.

In the approved allocations are programs for handicapped and hospitalized immigrant children, the care of the mentally ill, preventive medical and ambulatory services to immigrants. In addition, sums are allocated for projects devoted to elderly immigrants and the maintenance of a large network of kindergartens for children.

Mr. Stone, prominently identified with the Appeal's campaigns, told the meeting that the greater majority of Israel's recent arrivals are "still impoverished and had not yet been absorbed into Israel's economic and social life." "Israel today," he added, "has the crushing burden of defence; of providing water for a parched land; and for the development of large land areas that have been eroded through the centuries, in order to provide living space for the large numbers of Jews who are still to come from the lands of oppression."

This year, the United Jewish Appeal is seeking $109,400,000. The campaign has a two-fold purpose: $71 million will go to meet the budgetary requirements of the Appeal's agencies throughout the world in aiding refugees and needy Jews in thirty countries, with special emphasis on Israel. The remaining $38 million will be used as a special fund to cope with the costs of critical immigration, resettlement and absorption programs in Israel.

In pleading for more intensified support of the Appeal's 1965 campaign, Mr. Stone declared that "vast areas of unmet needs" must be dealt with in the immediate future, adding that "the philanthropic requirements of the people of Israel cannot be overstated."

"Even after making allowances," he added, "for the large amounts that come in from American Jewish communities, there are yet too many people who are not receiving adequate assistance." He warned that the JAFI, Inc. would be compelled to make certain entrenchments in its humanitarian programs unless a greater flow of philanthropic funds were made available. Recently, leaders of the UJA have appealed to American Jews to fulfill pledges in the Appeal's current drive. These leaders also have cited the grave sociological, economic, and educational problems that Israel faces with its new immigrant absorption.

This year, in an unusual financial transaction, eleven major American insurance companies, signed an agreement for a loan of $50 million to JAFI, Inc. The money will be utilized to liquidate outstanding short-term loans granted by the banks in recent years and which will enable the Jewish Agency, a New York corporation, to have an added cash flow of $4 million a year to meet the needs of immigrants in Israel.

TWO U.S. TEEN-AGE GIRLS TAKE PRIZES IN ISRAEL'S BIBLE CONTEST

By Henry W. Levy

Two young American high school girls from Far Rockaway, N.Y., Esther Freilich and Devorah Heisler, were the third and fourth prize winners at the International Youth Bible Championship held in Jerusalem in connection with Israel's Independence Day celebration. These two girls from the Hebrew Institute of Long Island Day School, among the twenty-two finalists from all over the world, placed behind Israeli twin brothers, Balfour and Herzl Hakak of Jerusalem.

Before a capacity audience at the huge Bet Ha'Am Auditorium in Jerusalem, which included Prime Minister Levi Eshkol, the Long Island girls displayed a knowledge of the Bible that dazzled the Israel spectators. The Israelis, to whom Bible contests are a sort of national world series, assume that their Israeli youngsters know the Bible, but they were astounded by the Biblical knowledge displayed by Miss Freilich and Miss Heisler and the seventeen other boys and girls from the Diaspora, from New York and Brussels, from London and Montreal, from Montevideo and Paris.

Last year, the seventeen-year-old Miss Freilich was the winner of the 1964 Bible contest sponsored in the United States by the Department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency, and Miss Heisler was tied for third place. The display of Biblical erudition of the girls was something of which Diaspora Jews may well be proud. It certainly should warm the hearts of Jewish educators in the U.S. and other countries, as it is indicative of the depth of knowledge achieved by many of their students. With this year's contest conducted entirely in Hebrew, it is particularly noteworthy that only twice was it necessary to translate a question from the Hebrew.

Both girls are daughters of rabbis, Rabbi Isaac B. Freilich, 562 Cedar Hill Road; and Rabbi Jacob A. Heisler, of 22-54 Brooks Avenue. The two girls are described by Rabbi Chaim Medetsky, Dean of the Hebrew Institute of Long Island, as typical American teenagers.

According to reports from Israel, the girls displayed wide knowledge of the Bible and answered the questions put to them with a charm that endeared them to the audience. With typical American frankness, they were not ashamed to admit when they didn't know an answer to a question put to them. On one occasion, the chairman of the Board of Adjudicators, Deputy Prime Minister Abba Eban, suggested to Miss Freilich that he would translate a question that seemed to trouble her into English. Bashfully, she said "It wouldn't be amiss."

Esther was to graduate from high school in June and plans to major in mathematics and physics at Barnard College to which she has already been admitted. She intends to use her prize money for her third year of college study at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Devorah is a younger girl, going on 16. She is now in the tenth grade and, as yet, has not made her decision on college.

The Hakak twins, who were the first and second place winners, are pupils in their senior year at a Jerusalem secondary school. They came to Israel with their parents from Iraq fifteen years ago, at the age of two years. Their father is a green grocer in Jerusalem. The virtuousity evinced by the two in rolling off the answers, quoting chapter and verse, was truly amazing. On more than one occasion Mr. Eban, who awarded the marks, said, "Two points, because, unfortunately, I cannot give you more."

Undoubtedly the happiest people in the hall were their parents, who stint themselves in order to be able to give them an education. On being asked who of the twins knows his Bible better, the father replied diplomatically: "Believe me, they are both excellent. They worked night and day preparing themselves for the contest. They were so engrossed in their studies that if we had not brought their food into their room they would have gone without."

Prizes, equal stipends of 1,000 Israel pounds each for the continuation of their studies, were given to each of the six top contestants in the Bible contest. Aside from the Hakak twins, and the two Far Rockway girls, the other top winners were Hagai Ben-Artzi of Israel and Moshe Cohen, of London.

Each of the participants in the contest, who had been elected Bible contest winners in their respective countries, received a certificate of participation and a Carte Bible Atlas as a compensation prize. The awards were presented by Prime Minister Eshkol who was present in the hall throughout the quiz. The six cash prizes were provided by the Prime Minister's Office, the Foreign, Defense, and Education Ministries, the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Jerusalem Municipality.

The questions were searching and variegated and were drawn mainly from the books of Genesis, Exodus, and Deuteronomy, the Early Prophets, Isaiah, Hosea, Amos, and Micah. An interesting innovation in this year's contest was the inclusion of material from Jewish legendary lore referring to the lives of the Patriarchs, as compiled by Bialik and Ravnitzky in "Safer Ha'Agadah."

This year's international Bible contest was the second in Israel, the first having been held two years ago. It is now planned that the competition will be held annually on Independence Day.

J.D.C. KINDERGARTENS KEEP DEDICATED TEACHER IN MOROCCO

By Lois Hackett

The educational program for some 1,500 children from three to five years old in nine Joint Distribution Committee-supported day care centers in Morocco has never been better. How has this been possible in the face of extensive migration, drastic losses in teaching staff, rapid turnover of children and deep cuts in financial support from local communities?

Credit goes to a soft-spoken woman named Mary Grist who has been serving as JDC Day-Care Consultant in Morocco for the past four years. She has not only surmounted recurrent crises but has also managed to enrich the program with the introduction of Hebrew, increased emphasis on story telling and the creation of library corners in each of the garderies, as the kindergartens in Morocco are called. In all, JDC supports nine day care centers in Morocco, mainly with United Jewish Appeal funds.

Mary Grist left a comfortable, well-paying position in an English teacher's college. She wanted to work "where there were tremendous needs," she explained. Touring Morocco on vacation some years back she discovered the Jews in the "mellahs" (slums) and the children in the JDC day care centers. Miss Grist saw how the day care centers took the children out of the mellahs' teeming, muddy streets, fed them, bathed them, clothed them, and cured their eye and scalp diseases. But of even greater importance were the intellectual horizons opened to the children who had known only the narrow, ingrown life of the mellah. Miss Grist offered her services and in view of her exceptional qualifications she was accepted.

Miss Grist was not looking for any sinecure. She expected, and even looked for, unusual problems. But she was not prepared for the situation which periodically threatened to reduce the program to utter chaos. For example, of 27 new teachers she trained at the beginning of 1964 only eight were left. The rest emigrated, married, or took other jobs.

In this turmoil it is the children who keep Mary Grist in Morocco. One of them was a skinny, ragged little four-year-old named Jacob whose family had just come to Fez from the "bled" as the back country of Morocco is called. The kindergarten in Fez is a particularly attractive one, located in a walled native house, with classrooms opening on a cool, green courtyard. It was in sharp contrast to the noise and stench of the raucous market place outside.

Miss Grist was sitting in the garden watching the children during their play period one day when Jacob's mother brought him through the gateway. She wore the Berber headdress and the full length robe that marked a newcomer from the hinterlands.

"Jacob was absolutely dumbfounded," Miss Grist said. "He had never seen anything like it. He ran from the sandbox to the swing, from one toy to another, trying each in turn. It was as if Paradise had opened its doors before him." Jacob's mother, equally thrilled, stayed for the rest of the morning. After the play period the children returned to the classroom for song-and-story time. The newcomer watched intently as the teacher began to sing. Again his thin face shone with delight and wonder.

"It was undoubtedly the first time in his life he had heard a grown-up sing a song for children," Miss Grist said. "The teacher was a beautiful, dark-haired, Moroccan Jewish girl. She had been in one of our training courses a year or two before. You could see that in Jacob's eyes she was a fairy princess come to life."

The increase in emigration has reduced the number of needy children in the day care centers from 2,060 at the beginning of 1964 to 1,467 at the end of the year. It also resulted in consolidation of 14 day care centers into nine at present. With fewer children and smaller classes it has been possible to expand the educational program. Miss Grist increased the amount of time devoted to story telling in an effort to enrich the children's speech and language.

"Because of the limitations of their environment Jewish children in Morocco speak poorly," she said. "They seldom use full sentences, they gesticulate rather than talk. They never say 'please,' 'thank you,' or 'excuse me.' By listening to good stories, well told, the children, with their unusual faculty for mimicry, will pick up vocabulary and good patterns and rhythms of speech."

This kind of thinking was also behind the creation of the library corners in all the day care centers. In a developing country like Morocco there are few books in the local language and culture. The children, almost all of whom come from incredibly poor families, have no books at home. And so, even with a limited number of books, the library corners give the children some opportunity to look at picture books and to pore through books where pictures develop the story.

"The response of the children has been remarkable," Miss Grist said. "The minute they reach the library they make a bee-line for their favorite books. They read very quietly, studying every picture and detail. Sometimes they show their new-found treasures to their friends. They learn to think, to talk, and to observe."

Whether her children stay in Morocco or migrate to other lands, Miss Grist takes pride in the emotional and intellectual nourishment she has provided for them in the important pre-school years in the day care centers. The greatest reward for her would be more children, more classes, more teachers, and more work.

ONLY IN THE SERENITY AND SANCTITY OF THE SYNAGOGUE

By Mrs. Harry Lieb (Lillian), In Conservative Judaism, writer by profession; member of Temple Israel of the Oranges and Maplewood, in South Orange, New Jersey

We were early. My husband always asks why we invariably arrive at the synagogue before the Bar Mitzvah boy and his family, and I always reply that I don't want to miss any part of the service. Then he repeats good-naturedly what he has already said dozens of times on similar occasions: that the Bar Mitzvah boy will not actually come up to the bimah for at least another hour. I know, I say, I know; and my daughters chime in, Oh, Daddy, aren't you resigned yet to opening the synagogue every time we're invited to a Bar Mitzvah?

My family complains mildly about getting up so early and rushing on Saturday, but with good humor, with a "let's-be-patient-with-Mother" attitude. We arrive at the synagogue feeling warm and secure and a little amused with each other; and I think all of us are secretly pleased to be entering on time: let the others come when they will!

On this particular Saturday morning we were indeed early. The chapel was strangely quiet, almost deserted. The beautiful multicolored Israeli-woven tapestry covered the wall behind the pulpit, bearing a variety of symbols: the Lion of Judah was prominent. There was an early-morning languidness. I leaned back comfortably, grateful to a building committee that had been responsible for the contoured, upholstered seats, and sighed with pleasure.

Bits of sunlight filtered through the stained-glass windows. The flickering shafts of light were mesmerizing. I closed my eyes. I thought of the Bar Mitzvah boy and his family . . . his grandmother who had been my favorite aunt in my youth . . . who had bought me a little gold Star of David for my sixth birthday. My mind began to wander idly, touching gently on long-forgotten things, and I was launched on a mental peregrination from which evolved an experience of unique and simple sublimity.

When I was a child, I began to remember, I shared a room with an older sister who, as older sisters will, felt she could exercise a natural right over my "property." Small treasures: a necklace brought back from the Virgin Islands by a favorite bachelor uncle, a giant Indian penny, the little gold Star of David, a worn but beautifully illustrated book of Stevenson's verses, a celluloid doll with a homemade cardboard picture hat and a dress fashioned from scraps. Small treasures, but they had to be hidden well if they were to be saved from my sister. I hid them so well in different parts of the house that only rarely did my sister come upon them.

When I was alone, I would lay my possessions out on my bed and examine them carefully, outlining with delight the small markings on the penny and the tiny carvings on the necklace. I would dress and undress the doll, all the time reciting Stevenson verses as well as some verses of my own. When I heard the apartment bell signal from the lobby, I quickly gathered my things together and placed them in their secret spots. But for the rest of the day and sometimes for many days following, I felt a comfort and happiness that stemmed from the pleasure of having examined my treasures.

On Friday nights, in deference to the Sabbath, there was an undeclared truce between my sister and me. The white tablecloth sparkled with a starched gleam which reflected the shadows made by the flickering, newly blessed candles. The delicious fresh smell of Mother's home-baked hallah made our mouths water. After the leisurely Sabbath meal our father would tell us "stories" from the Torah, from Sholem Aleichem, from the lore on the Land of Israel. On Friday nights our mother relaxed her tempo and sat quietly. I had no desire to tease my sister, and she never attempted to touch my Star of David, which I wore in full view.

Many years have passed, I thought now, still bemused, and I have gained the privilege of privacy. In this privacy I have found that when things seem to be going all wrong and I am heavy-hearted and dispirited, it is good to take stock of my problems. I enumerate all the things which may be contributing to my distress, examine them, seek to evaluate them separately. By the time I have finished examining and evaluating, the depression and stress seem to evaporate.

Less frequently do I take the time to enumerate the small positive aspects of my days, having fallen into the habit of accepting good things casually. But on this day in the synagogue, as I waited for the services to begin, I found myself recapitulating my old childhood habit of laying out my "treasures" and examining each one with joy.

Perhaps this pleasurable experience stemmed naturally from dim subconscious associations with the synagogue; for in the synagogue my sister and I had felt as one. There the truce between us was inviolate. Neither of us enjoyed going; we were bored and impatient with the Hebrew prayers which we did not understand and the sermons that were beyond our comprehension. But I think that even then, even in our childish boredom, something must have touched us, something so tenuous and subtle and special that we were wholly unaware of it, and it was this which was to come to fruition years later in different ways. Neither of us has ever strayed from synagogue life. My sister has always been a dedicated, active, and valuable member of her congregation. Perhaps the quietude, the quality of holiness, which we resisted as children was the augury of my experience decades later.

The Sabbath morning of this particular Bar Mitzvah had been preceded by a month of disappointments and tensions. I had been feeling ill with symptoms of an old ailment. My favorite uncle, he of the childhood necklace, had passed away; and the aunt of the gold Star of David was very ill. Our teenager was flexing her newly developed temperament. In my husband's office, business was behind last year's level. I was feeling slighted, annoyed by insignificant trivia. I decided to go to Baltimore for two days for a complete check-up by the doctor who had helped me once before.

No sooner had I settled myself comfortably on the train for the three-hour trip than a personable man sat down next to me. I was aware of his scrutiny, but before I could wonder too much about it, he spoke to me. I was startled to hear him address me by my maiden name. He mentioned his own name, and recognition came. We had not met in over twenty years. He had been an old beau, but we had gone separate ways.

The meeting on the train was a wonderful reunion. There was no awkwardness. Although there were practically no parallels in the way our lives had developed — he had attained the success and status he had worked for, leaving no room for marriage or children or religious affiliations — there was a delightful rapport between us. He was going to Washington on business, and when I said good-bye at Baltimore, he put an arm around me and kissed me. It was a gentle, friendly kiss, suggesting nothing more than pleasure with our encounter, yet I floated up the stairs of the station, singing silently to myself.

At the hotel where my doctor's secretary had made a reservation for me, my room turned out to be delightful, not the studio bedroom I had had before: a huge fireplace, a comfortable bed with several pillows plumped for reading comfort, the evening paper waiting.

Just as good was my visit with my doctor. My symptoms turned out to be of no organic significance; my doctor's advice was sage and comforting; my concern for my health was eased. When I called home I found that my teenage daughter was "on cloud nine" because she had received two invitations to the school dance. My husband had negotiated some new business that afternoon and was more optimistic and cheerful than he had been all month. I was able to retire for the night in a frame of mind conducive to a good night's rest.

Now, several days later, sitting in the synagogue with my family, the services having begun and progressed to the reading of the Torah, I listened to the clear, still unchanged voice of the young Bar Mitzvah boy chanting the maftir. He carried the Torah proudly through the congregation, the rabbi and cantor following him and all three singing the haunting melody of the twenty-ninth Psalm. I had a keen sense of the congregation being one with all the congregations of Israel throughout the world, throughout the centuries, throughout my lifetime.

The services took longer than usual. As I listened to the cantor, a unique serenity flowed through me. A pure undiluted bliss such as one generally associates with the Nirvana of Buddhism, yet indigenous exclusively to the synagogue: to the maftir, to the twenty-ninth Psalm, to the amidah. It was powerful, yet tranquil. It was an experience of unmitigated joy, and I would have been content to sit for hours in this state.

The cantor's voice stopped, and my mood was abruptly broken. Without any conscious direction or design, I found myself practicing my childhood habit of "treasure evaluating." I recalled each precious occurrence of the previous week, examining it carefully and joyfully; the exhilarating train trip with my old friend, the hotel room and its comforts, the moments of aloneness so rare in a contented family life, the reassuring visit with my doctor, the ensuing peace of mind, my husband's optimism, my daughter's girlish happiness. I allowed myself several moments with these treasures, cherishing each of them individually, before bringing myself up to the Bar Mitzvah service and the supreme bliss I had just experienced.

Small things, maybe; insignificant in the pattern of a life-time. But as I gathered them and examined them and took such sweet pleasure in them, I was vastly comforted. I felt whole and complete and I tucked them away carefully in my mind. Over the Holy Ark, the ner tamid glowed. I had a sense of awareness that only here, in the synagogue and in its atmosphere of serenity and sanctity, could I so completely and satisfyingly have fashioned this experience out of the events of my life. It's good to come early, I thought happily, and turned my full attention to the rabbi, who was just beginning his sermon.

JEWISH LIFE IN SANTO DOMINGO

From the diary of Captain Howard M. Graber, Jewish Chaplain with the U.S. Army 15th Field Hospital

Late one Friday night a non-Jewish chaplain woke me and said there was a Jewish soldier who wanted to see me. The boy was going on a special mission from which he thought he might never return. He asked me for my blessing and left me his parents' address so that I could write to them in case anything happened to him. I still don't know the outcome of this secret mission and I am still haunted by the pleading words of this young patriotic American. It is worth being a chaplain just to be of help on an occasion like this.

As I travel around Santo Domingo, I fly my Jewish chaplain flag on my jeep. Wherever I go people see that there is a Jewish chaplain nearby. Even the Dominicans turn with interest as it passes them by on the streets. I have been stopped by Jewish soldiers and had a chance to talk with them. Our units are scattered throughout the area and, as expected, our Jewish boys are also spread around thinly.

The major part of my work here is as chaplain of the 15th Field Hospital. I visit with the personnel each day to keep up their morale and to counsel with them, and I also serve the wounded and sick. I arrange for Catholic and Protestant services and contact the unit chaplains when necessary. Although I have been able to get in touch with no more than 100 Jewish servicemen in the area, I still feel my presence is necessary and important. I feel that it is also good for the non-Jews to see a Jewish chaplain soldiering and roughing it with them.

I had the opportunity of conducting services on the aircraft assault carrier USS Okinawa. We had 12 Jewish men and officers at the minyan. I will attempt to make it a regular service as long as I am here. I went out to the carrier by helicopter. It remains to be seen whether I will also hold a service on the USS Boxer.

I have been distributing the Mogen Davids that I received from the National Jewish Welfare Board. Letters are written from my office to the parents of those who ask me to tell their folks that I met them and that they are well.

A small group of men attend the regular Shabbas services I hold here at the 15th Field Hospital. I also conducted worship for some servicemen at the local Synagogue one Friday afternoon. We joined in prayer with 25 members of the civilian Jewish community. The service was held at 1600 hours as there is an 1800 hours curfew for civilians. Then, we made a quick dash back to our location, as 1800 hours is the time when sniping is frequent.

It was through the courtesy of the Marine Corps chaplain that I was able to establish contact with Parroquia Israelita, the civilian Jewish community of Santo Domingo. The local Synagogue, built by the late Dominican president, Generalissimo Rafael L. Trujillo, who attended services there on occasion and who was very kind to the Jews, is not far from the Ambassador Hotel in the International Zone. There are approximately 30 Jewish families in the city now. Some of the Jews fled when the revolution started and took refuge in Puerto Rico and other places.

The remaining Jews are in a precarious position. Most of those to whom I spoke are intent on leaving as soon as they can liquidate their businesses and dispose of their property. While there is no anti-Semitism in the Dominican Republic, the future of the Jewish community will be uncertain even after normal conditions have been re-established. I am told that there is bad feeling between the haves and the have-nots. The Jews here, because of their economic position, are among the haves.

I would like to visit Sosua, as I was told that the Jews in that agricultural colony of refugee settlers, which was established in 1940, are also shaken up. Even though there is no revolution in Sosua, the outcome of the situation here will determine their fate also. From what I hear, there are about 30 Jewish families left in Sosua.

I am looking forward to receiving the religious supplies and food packages which JWB is sending for the American Jewish servicemen. The men here certainly will appreciate this type of gift.

On matters educational, Dr. Bloustein was asked whether he favored keeping Bennington, which enrolls 880, as an all-girl institution. "I'm not strongly committed to separate women's colleges," he replied. "The same tendencies that have caused Yale and Princeton to think about co-education are causing us to think about it too. But Bennington is still in the very early thinking stage. As a matter of fact, the girls I have talked to at Bennington like going to an all-women college — they feel relieved of competition in a co-ed society."

In 1962, a Yale faculty committee recommended that women undergraduates be admitted as "a national duty . . . to provide the rigorous training for women that we supply for men." No Yale action has been taken to date.

Last February, Dr. Robert F. Gobeen, president of Princeton, declared that "the university has no plans for co-education." A month before, the campus newspaper, The Daily Princetonian, had urged co-education as "the solution for Princeton's social illness," says the New York Herald Tribune. Dr. Bloustein is probably the only college president who has a client in the death house at Sing Sing Prison, Ossining, N. Y.

LOUIS PINCUS SUCCEEDS SHARETT AS THE NEW AGENCY CHAIRMAN

By Haim Shachter

The story is told how one day in June, 1961, as Dr. Nahum Goldmann, President of the World Zionist Organization, had boarded a plane in Paris for Lydda he was overjoyed to find Louis Pincus seated immediately behind him and there and then offered him the post of treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel (the World Zionist Organization), which was being vacated by Dr. Dov Joseph who had decided to devote himself entirely to his Parliamentary career.

Mr. Pincus answered that his decision would be determined by the opinion of four people whom he must consult. The first was Moshe Sharett, who was to assume the position of chairman of the Jewish Agency Executive; the others were the three people who had previously held the position of treasurer of the World Zionist Organization. There was a consensus of opinion among the four, and thus Louis Pincus accepted the post of treasurer of the Jewish Agency, a position in which he has acquitted himself with unqualified distinction.

Following the death of Moshe Sharett, he was unanimously appointed acting chairman of the Jewish Agency Executive by the members of that body in Jerusalem and New York. The election to the office of chairman rests with the Zionist General Council, but in accordance with Article 43 of the Constitution of the World Zionist Organization: "Pending such election the functions of the chairman shall be carried out by one of the members of the Executive elected by them by majority vote."

Aryeh Louis Pincus came to Israel from South Africa in his early youth. Born in the Orange Free State 53 years ago, to a family steeped in the Zionist tradition, he studied Arts, Economics, and Law at Witwatersrand University, in Johannesburg, from which he graduated in 1934. Admitted to the South African Bar that same year, he began the practice of law, and soon gained a reputation as one of South Africa's most successful and brilliant lawyers.

Pincus had always been an ardent Zionist, ever since his first days in a Young Israel Society, and so it was natural that while at the University he founded the University Zionist Society and helped to launch the Habonim Movement in South Africa. Later he became chairman of the South African Zionist Specialist Party, the local branch of the Ihud Olami of Mapai, developing it from a relatively obscure body which appealed mainly to the Yiddish speaking public, into an organization which successfully attracted the young Jewish generation in South Africa.

He was vice-chairman of the South African Zionist Federation, which is one of the most strongly organized and active Zionist bodies in the Jewish world, and was also a member of the executive of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies which is the ceiling body of the Jewish community in South Africa.

Urged to materialize his Zionist convictions, Aryeh Pincus arrived to Israel before the proclamation of the State, and when the Ministry of Transport was established in 1948, Pincus became its Secretary General and Legal Adviser to David Remez, the late Minister of Transport, who was to exert so profound an influence on his thinking. During the first months of the State which followed the chaos left in the country by the Mandatory Government, Pincus played an active role in creating Israel's vital communication services.

One of the lasting ventures devised by the late David Remez was a national airline, and it was Aryeh Pincus who set to work to prepare the framework for the company which was to become El Al, the National Israel Airlines. It was only natural for Pincus later to be transferred from the Ministry of Transport to become El Al's first managing director, a post that he held for seven eventful years during which he transformed it from a modest beginnings into one of the world's most stable and reliable air transportation companies.

On resigning from his position in El Al in 1956, Pincus returned to his legal practice and opened an office in Tel Aviv. At the same time, however, he continued to play an active role in the country's public life. He was a member of the Zionist General Council and chairman of its finance committee, and also headed the committee that drew up the new constitution of the World Zionist Organization. In the Israel Labor Party (Mapai), of which he is a member of the Central Committee, he made his special mark by his activities as chairman of the academic section of the Mapai Party and as member of the executive of the World Union of Poalei Zion (Ihud Olamit).

A powerful, convincing, and inspiring orator, Mr. Pincus has won a place for himself as an outstanding leader in many Jewish communities throughout the world. His four years as treasurer of the Jewish Agency have been marked by outstanding efficiency and great vision. He will now couple these responsibilities with those of chairman of the World Zionist Executive. His views on the present-day functions of the Zionist Movement were given succinct expression in a statement written early this year on the eve of the last Zionist Congress:

"The Zionist Movement has not yet completed its task. Its tasks today are much wider, possibly much deeper and certainly much more difficult. It must create and encourage a large and constant flow of immigration to Israel, enlist the assistance of the Diaspora for it and for the State in various fields, but at the same time it must be the central and activating force in the life of the Jewish communities in the Diaspora (Dispersion).

Aryeh Pincus, who married Miss Cynthia Rabkin in 1945 and is the father of two sons, is a congenial personality. He has the knack of finding his way to the heart of every man with whom he comes in contact, and as such he is beloved by everyone. He is popular in America just as he is popular in South Africa, and has gained the respect and admiration of Zionist leaders the world over. This accounts for his great achievements in the difficult negotiations he has handled as treasurer of the Jewish Agency, and for his great success in fund-raising campaigns.

He has been a principal speaker at several national UJA opening campaign functions in the United States, and is a familiar figure throughout the country as a result of his addresses at many community welfare fund campaign meetings. His capacity for work is nothing short of phenomenal. His regular work day is from early morning until the small hours of the night.

Now that he has assumed the full administrative responsibility of the World Zionist Organization, it is doubtful whether he will have any time left for his hobby of boating. But there is one activity which his close associates say he will not give up. Since its founding, he has been closely associated with the Friends of the Tel Aviv University, and since 1962, he had been chairman of the Board of Governors of that academic institution.

CROWD WAITS NEARLY AN HOUR FOR BEN-GURION, LISTENS BRIEFLY

David Ben-Gurion was only partly successful in his first attempt to rally popular support for his bid to re-enter politics. The former Premier attracted a huge crowd at his first street rally of the election campaign, in Jerusalem, but he lost much of the attention of his audience, says the New York Times, in his long, discursive talk on familiar subjects.

Several thousand people, mainly young men, waited for nearly an hour in Menora Square to hear the 78-year-old leader, who is heading a new party, the Israeli Workers.

The growing crowd stirred impatiently, waiting for the man who gave up the Premiership two years ago and turned it over to Levi Eshkol, waiting to hear him explain what the split in Mapai, the Israeli Labor party, was all about.

Again and again, a party functionary mounted a platform on the back of a truck to announce that Mr. Ben-Gurion would be along "in a few minutes." Soon the crowd was reciting the announcement.

Then the short, familiar figure appeared on the platform. Mr. Ben-Gurion was wearing a suit jacket over his open-collared white shirt. The packed street and the roofs and balconies of apartment houses rang with cheers and applause.

Mr. Ben-Gurion said he would be brief, that he would speak about a few points that "bothered him." He evoked memories of the war of independence, of the need for security against hostile neighbors, of the aloofness of India, Pakistan, and Communist China. Then he recalled again the days of the war.

A cool breeze swept across the hilltop square, now darkened, but the heat of the day remained. Impatient applause could be heard, and conversations sprang up at the edges of the crowd.

A man in the crowd said: "Eshkol I understand. This one is way beyond me." Another asked a friend, "For this he needs a new party?" Mr. Ben-Gurion was telling of a conversation with Einstein, says the New York Times, but the audience seemed not to care.

HEBREW U. 40 YEARS AGO: A FEW HUNDRED STUDENTS; NOW: 10,000 STUDENTS; FACULTY, 1,200

In April of 1925, seven years after twelve foundation stones, symbolizing the Tribes of Israel, had been set on the crest of Mount Scopus, the Hebrew University was opened.

It consisted of three research institutes, Chemistry, Microbiology, and Jewish Studies, housed in one modest building. With the assistance of Societies of Friends, established all over the world, and under the direction of an international Board of Governors, the University grew apace. By 1948 there was a Faculty of Humanities, a Faculty of Science, a Pre-Faculty of Medicine, a School of Agriculture, a Department of Education, and the Hebrew University Press, as well as the Jewish National and University Library, which contained close to one-half million volumes. There were also two museums.

With the establishment of the State of Israel, and the ensuing War of Liberation, Mount Scopus was cut off and it became necessary for the University to leave the area. During the first years of statehood, the University carried on in make-do buildings scattered throughout Jerusalem. At one point there were some fifty buildings, many of them pre-fabricated structures providing little more than shelter. In 1953 a decision was made to build a new campus at Givat Ram. The site was dedicated the next year, and by 1958 the first new buildings were officially opened.

Since that time, the University has had phenomenal growth. There are over forty University buildings at Givat Ram. At a Medical Center, established by the University and Hadassah at Ein Karem, the School of Dentistry was officially opened last June, the Medical School will be opened soon, and work is under way on the School of Pharmacy. There has also been considerable new growth at the School of Agriculture at Rehovoth.

From the handful of scholars in the original three institutes and the few hundred students who studied at Mount Scopus, the University now has a student body which numbers over 10,000 and a faculty of 1,200. Its range of studies is comprehensive and, as witnessed by the many international science and educational congresses and symposia which are held on its premises, the University has achieved greatly enhanced status among its peers throughout the world.

REDELHEIM WAS ISRAELI-BORN HEAD HEAD OF U.S. ZIONISTS

Abraham A. Redelheim, president of the Zionist Organization of America from 1958 to 1960, died in Brooklyn, N. Y. He was sixty-eight years old and lived at 5118 14th Avenue, Brooklyn. Mr. Redelheim, a public relations consultant, was born in Jerusalem in 1897, says the New York Times. He had been a journalist and public relations consultant to the Foreign Language Press of America.

Active in a number of Jewish and Zionist organizations, he served as president of the Histadruth Ivrith of America, an association for propagating the Hebrew language. He was grand master of the Fraternal Order of Bnai Zion in 1946-47; and was a director of the Jewish National Fund.

Mr. Redelheim took the position that American Zionism should not identify itself with any political party in Israel. He was defeated by Rabbi Irving Miller in an election for the presidency of the Zionist Organization in 1952 on the issue.

Rabbi Miller favored a resolution expressing the organizations "close ties" with the General Zionist Party of Israel.

Mr. Redelheim was a fervent champion of Hebrew language education for Jews in the United States. He voiced regret publicly that "in hundreds of Sunday classes in Jewish schools the Bible is being taught in English translation, depriving the child of the true inner meaning of Biblical passages."

He also spoke out against Israeli leaders who were lukewarm toward organized Zionism, though he did not name them. In 1960 he told an audience:

"The deterioration in the degree of American public support for Israel's just claims, coupled with the growing pro-Arab position of the State Department, seems in direct ratio to the extent that the organized Zionist movement has been downgraded by Israel leaders. The campaign of denigrating Zionism by high Israeli officials over a period of years has not been overlooked in Washington."

He leaves his wife, Mrs. Ziporah Rosenberg Redelheim; a son, Phillip; a daughter, Mrs. Norma Edison; his father, Rabbi Jacob Wolf Redelheim, of Tel Aviv; and seven grandchildren, says the New York Times. A funeral service was held at Congregation Shomrei Emunah, 5202 14th Avenue, Brooklyn.

Brandeis U. Second $6 Million Grant By Ford Foundation Makes It One Of Only Five

Brandeis University, in Waltham, Mass., was awarded a second $6 million grant by the Ford Foundation for use in its "overall academic development." Thus sixteen-year-old Brandeis becomes one of only five universities in the United States to be so honored by the Foundation. President Abram L. Sachar, who said he was "jubilant", said that the University would use the money primarily to encourage endowments for faculty chairs, as well as fellowships and scholarships.

The new grant, which Brandeis must earn by raising $18 million in three years, was awarded under the Foundation's Special Program in Education and may be used for any academic purpose Brandeis determines. This is in contrast to most Foundation grants, which are for a specified purpose, such as research, fellowships, or experimentation in certain subjects.

Also receiving second grants were the University of Southern California, $7.5 million; and Brown University, $5 million. Johns Hopkins University and the University of Notre Dame received second grants in 1962 and 1963, respectively.

Brandeis received its first $6 million grant in December, 1962. Three years were allotted to the University to raise the required $18 million in matching funds. However, Brandeis completed the matching requirements in half the allotted time, thus qualifying the University for the opportunity to apply for still another Ford grant.

"The East is an area of academic excellence where only the very best is appreciated. Here we are, a teenager among the real university giants, and we had better be good, and stay good, to warrant going steady with the best," Dr. Sachar said. It means a great deal to have the Ford Foundation refer to Brandeis as one of the national centers of outstanding scholarship, teaching, and service to society. Every University has pressing needs for academic endowments to support faculty salaries.

"It is much easier to obtain physical facilities than professorships. This is why the new Ford grant will be used as a magnetic field to attract support for academic needs. When a donor contributes three-fourths of the endowment for a chair or a fellowship or a scholarship, one-quarter will be added from the Ford Funds as a special bonus to the donor. In this way, private donors and the Ford Foundation become partners in an exciting educational adventure which we hope, where Brandeis is concerned, will help to insure another major national asset," Dr. Sachar said.
